Read Passage One and answer questions 1-10 in the Question-Answer Book.

Passage One:

How to make healthier mixed cold noodles

- 1 [1] Hongkongers are known for being practical and efficient, and this applies to some of their local street snacks. One such dish is mixed cold noodles, where cold noodles are mixed with a myriad of ingredients, shaken in a bag, and eaten on the go. This fuss-free summer takeaway dish can be found in many shopping districts where locals and tourists stop for a quick pick-me-up before resuming their activities for the day. For as little as HK$12, you can get a bag of DIY noodles with four ingredients of your choice from places such as Bai Wei Shi Pei, a popular franchise with multiple outlets across the city.
- 5 [2] There are dozens of ingredients to choose from, ranging from gizzard and pig intestines, to marinated octopus, fish balls, and corn. Some go-to toppings include seaweed salad, conch with sauce, sesame octopus, and quail eggs, according to Kathy Ng Yiu-fan, a senior nutritionist at the Kat-Spirit Nutrition Centre in Hong Kong.
- 10 This combination is popular for its delectable umami taste, and the conch and sesame octopus add an extra layer of meaty texture to the cold noodles. But Ng warned that the bag of deliciousness was loaded with sodium, sugar, and fat. "Some of these toppings are heavily seasoned with oil and sugar. In addition, garlic sauce – which usually comprises soy sauce, sesame oil, chilli sauce and minced garlic in oil – is a common condiment added for an extra punch. This further increases the total sodium and sugar count," Ng said.
- 15 [3] Ng also broke down the nutritional values of these three "terrible" ingredients: 100 grams of seaweed salad contains 76 calories, 5.2 grams of fat, 4.5 grams of sugar, 5.6 grams of carbohydrates, 1.8 grams of protein and 0.98 grams of sodium. The same amount of sesame octopus consists of 97 calories, 1.8 grams of fat, 8.1 grams of sugar, 9.2 grams of carbohydrates, 10.7 grams of protein and 1.34 grams of sodium. As for conch with sauce, 100 grams of this rubbery shellfish is packed with 46.7 calories, 30 grams of fat, 16 grams of sugar, 49.8 grams of carbohydrates, 37.2 grams of protein, and 0.3 grams of sodium. "As you can see, combining all three toppings into your mixed cold noodles will easily rack up your overall sugar and fat intake," Ng said. "Not to mention, a diet high in sodium can increase the risk of hypertension or even stomach cancer."
- 20 [4] Ng added that although the type of noodle could affect the nutritional content of a dish, most vendors generally use rice and cold noodles – good sources of carbohydrates that provide our bodies with the necessary macronutrients for development and growth. Ng also recommended no more than two servings of mixed cold noodles per week and to opt for only one of the "terrible trio" each time to stay within the World Health Organization's recommended sodium intake of fewer than 2,000 milligrams per day.
- 25 [5] An even healthier idea would be to replace all three ingredients with corn, crab sticks, fish balls or even quail eggs, and to ask for less sauce. If you are feeling particularly health-conscious or inspired to make your own noodles, here's a nutritionist-approved recipe your body will thank you for.

[6] Fresh DIY chilled noodles

Ingredients (serves 2):

300 grams rice noodles or fresh egg noodles
2 teaspoons sesame oil

35 Sauce:

2 tablespoons oyster sauce or abalone sauce
2 teaspoons sriracha sauce
2 teaspoons soy sauce
2 garlic cloves (finely chopped)

40 Toppings:

2 crab sticks (kani), sliced or shredded
100 grams unsalted dried seaweed
100 grams blanched chicken, shredded
100 grams canned corn, drained

45 a handful of cucumber slices

a handful of mung bean sprouts, blanched

[7] Directions

1. In a small skillet, heat the sesame oil until it begins to shimmer or ripple. Transfer to a bowl and let it cool.
2. Cook the noodles according to the package directions. Drain and toss with the oil in a separate bowl. Cover
50 and refrigerate until cold.
3. Meanwhile, prepare all the ingredients and leave them to chill in the fridge for at least 15 minutes.
4. Divide the noodles into two small containers. Add the toppings of your choice. Add the sauce and mix well. Enjoy your refreshing chilled noodles!

Read Passage Two and answer questions 11-20 in the Question-Answer Book.

Passage Two:

Hong Kong's last birdcage maker talks about the impact of the craft on the city's history

- 1 [1] Bird-keeping has long been popular in Chinese culture. It began during the Qing dynasty (1636-1912), when soldiers raised songbirds and listened to their melodies during peacetime. As time went on, more and more people learned the joy of showing off a pet bird and its cage.
- 5 [2] In Hong Kong, people started keeping birds because they were easy pets to have in small flats, and unlike dogs and cats, were allowed to be kept in public housing estates. Old men would take their birds to parks, hang the cages on trees, and listen to their chirping while they played mahjong. But the trade is now in danger of disappearing.
- 10 [3] After the 1997 outbreak of bird flu, the government introduced stricter rules about owning birds. According to 2005 census data, birds made up about 10 per cent of the total number of animals owned in the city. By 2016, a study into Hong Kong's vet industry estimated that bird ownership had fallen to less than seven per cent. But that's not to say there aren't still fans of the creatures and their carefully crafted homes.
- 15 [4] When you walk into Yuen Po Street Bird Garden in Mong Kok, you are greeted by a symphony of songbirds and traditional Chinese music. Parrots, budgies, finches and cockatoos squawk, whistle and sing for attention. And nestled amid the chaos sits Chan Lok-choi, Hong Kong's last birdcage maker. "I started learning how to make birdcages in 1955 from my uncle, who referred me to one of the greatest birdcage masters in Hong Kong, Cheuk Hong," Chan told SCMP's Post Magazine in April. He started training with Cheuk Hong at the age of 12, and went on to make a name for himself as a master craftsman of traditional bird cages.
- 20 [5] By the 1970s, he had his own shop on Hong Lok Street in Mong Kok, the street that used to be the place to go to buy birds, bird cages and related products. It was known as "Bird Street" among the locals. In the 1990s, when that site was demolished, Chan relocated to the bird garden in Yuen Po Street.
- [6] Making bird cages isn't as simple as you might think. First, you must shave pieces of bamboo, like the ones used in construction, and soak them in hot water for hours. Then you have to physically bend and mould the bamboo pieces under kerosene lamps, and nail them, carefully, together. The process can take up to several months.
- 25 [7] Bird cages come in all shapes and sizes. Some are barely bigger than a person's head, while others are more than 1.5 metres tall. Many households now use them as decoration rather than to house birds. But with fewer pet birds comes less of a need for new cages. Chan no longer crafts cages from scratch. Instead, he focuses on repair work, and on taking care of his own pets. "Sometimes I come here just to feed my birds," he told Post Magazine. "They're why I am here. Business is not so good these days."
- 30 [8] Yuen Po Street is still probably the most popular place in Hong Kong for bird lovers to meet for a chat while taking their pets out for a stroll. Chan's dying craft is a labour of love and takes a long time to perfect. Even if birds are no longer such commonly kept pets, it is still worth celebrating the history and impact that birdcage making has had on Hong Kong's culture.

A. Verb Forms (10 marks)

Fill in the blanks with the words provided in brackets in their correct forms.

In this city that never sleeps, it's easy to miss the small things: an old, decaying building in Sham Shui Po, a window frame on the Star Ferry, or even the last remaining dai pai dong on Elgin Street in Central. But if you (1) (stop) for a minute to look a little closer, you might notice they share something unusual in common: they are painted the same colour, a dark, rich, military green. So why is this?

The 87-year-old owner of an old antique stall on Upper Lascar Row in Central, surnamed Wong, says his shop doors and panels (2) (paint) military green for as long as he can remember. "I don't know why, I just know that when this store first opened in the 1960s, it was just painted green; many shops and dai pai dong were painted green," Wong told Young Post. "It might be good luck, or good fortune."

In a culture that (3) (have) many traditions rooted in luck or superstition, Wong's explanation might seem reasonable. However, according to academics, the real reason is much simpler: it was a cheap option. Dr Lee Ho-yin, associate professor of the architecture department at the University of Hong Kong, says that after the Second World War, green paint was abundant, and this is why we see so much of it.

"During the war years, green was used a lot – on trucks, in military barracks, on battleships – as it's the colour of camouflage," says Lee. "When the war ended, there was so much leftover paint that it was just an easy and cheap choice for many vendors. There (4) (be) also shortages of other colours."

Hong Kong's post-war economic recovery was slow, according to Lee. There wasn't much surplus cash, and many people (5) (lose) all of their wealth and had to start from scratch. As a result, many people went with a quick fix, and just about everything (6) (paint) the same dark green, with a few exceptions where pink or white paint was used.

The army shade had another advantage. "Green was also a popular choice because it (7) (not appear) dirty easily," says Lee. "It was most common through the 1950s, up until the 1960s. It was everywhere." This trend, explains Lee, was not just found in Hong Kong. In fact, other countries also had a large amount of paint left over after the war. As a result, cars built in those days were painted in shades of green, too.

In addition to the street stalls, Lee says that Hong Kong people (8) (accustom) to choosing green as it might have reminded them of large fields from their villages on the mainland. "It could have been a sense of nostalgia for many old Hongkongers, too," says Lee.

The colour's popularity began to fade in the 1970s, as Hong Kong started to rebuild and eventually thrive, becoming one of the world's dominant financial hubs. "So people started using different colours: red or blue," says Lee. "In fact, one of the most famous historical buildings in Hong Kong (9) (paint) a bright blue – The Blue House in Wan Chai."

However, for many old vendors still operating from their street stalls, green (10) (become) a part of their identity. When a portion of the Fa Yuen Street market in Mong Kok burned down in 2010, they rebuilt their stalls and dutifully painted them the same hue.

Changing society

In a rural farming community, extended families tend to live close together, so it is easier to (1) their human resources for farming. But with the rapid development of the economy and cities under economic reforms in China, this mode of family life has undergone drastic changes. With rapid (2), large families disintegrate.

The focus of economic activity has shifted from the countryside to the city, and young people have started to move away from rural communities. Big families have become small, and thus close interaction among extended family members has broken down (3).

City life is hectic, and people hardly find time to see each other, which has also contributed to the growing distance between relatives, who may only meet at Lunar New Year. For city (4), relationships with friends, classmates and workmates have taken on higher importance. When small families can survive on their own in the modern economy, the function of large families is lost. Thus, the cohesiveness that (5) traditional large Chinese families has evaporated with changes in modern society.

How to improve your public speaking skills: Tips from an award-winning speaker

Public speaking and debate are vital components of many secondary school extracurricular programmes. However, public speaking can be a (1) (daunt) task for a beginner, as people often get caught up in their mistakes or get nervous about what the audience will think of them.

We sat down with Markandaya Karthik, a Hong Kong Schools Debating and Public Speaking Community member and World Champion in the After Dinner Speech Category, for a few tips on how students can improve their public speaking skills. He gave some (2) (advisory) about how to write and deliver speeches, as well as habits (3) (contest) can form that will help them prepare for the big day.

Passion is key

To start, you need to have a topic you care about. "Focusing on topics you're passionate about (4) (persuasion) the audience to agree with your view, which is what public speaking is all about," he said. The star student took part in the Junior Public Speaking Championships in Hong Kong in Year 8. He won the persuasive speech category for his speech on child (5) (trafficker) – a topic he was interested in and cared about greatly. "During my research, I continued to develop my interest in the topic, which allowed me to be (6) (nature) enthusiastic and more (7) (sincerity) in my speech. This is a great way to earn style points."

How to write an effective speech

Start writing your speech early, Markandaya says. "I know many people who write their speeches the night before the competition. It's never worked for me."

"I think this technique doesn't work for a lot of people because you could write something the night before a competition that sounds really impactful and powerful to you, but the next morning, it seems like absolute (8) (sense)."

"That's why it's important to take the time to do thorough research, write drafts, proofread and (9) (memorable) your speech. Don't (10) (procrastination); it's a process that takes time."

Family

Family is composed (1) people who are related by blood. In a traditional Chinese family, children live with their parents after getting married, so it is common (2) three generations of one family to live (3) one roof.

Kinship

Kinship refers to a family unit that includes relations through blood, by marriage or adoption.

Clan

Clan is an extension (4) the family, and has a broader base. It includes multiple generations of people who have a common ancestor, and share the same family name. Clanship has to do (5) geographical locality. Often, people in the same clan live in the same village. There is also often a common ancestral hall where a centralised clan record is kept.

Google says I am sick

May Wong has been searching for medical information and doing self-diagnosis since 2016, because she suspects that she has depression. She also looks for other health-related information online and does online diagnostic tests whenever she has health concerns.

"I sometimes spend around five to six hours a day (1) (look) for health information like different forms of clinical depression and diagnostic criteria," Wong says.

Wong's symptoms of sickness include abnormal menstruation, anxiety, and self-abasement. Despite (2) (have) those symptoms, Wong is more comfortable with (3) (diagnose) herself than seeking medical advice from professionals.

Since she began feeling acutely depressed, some of her friends have kept a distance from her instead of (4) (care) for her. However, one close friend encouraged her to see a doctor or counsellor rather than looking things up online. Last month, May had two appointments with a psychologist, and says she is already feeling a bit better.

Rao Haiyu, who underwent plastic nose surgery in a small private clinic in China in 1993, shares similar experiences of conducting online searches about symptoms of diseases and (5) (make) self-diagnoses. In 2019, she started (6) (search) online for the long-term side effects of nose jobs. She learnt from Google searches that some kinds of injectable soft-tissue fillers may lead to serious complications like foreign body reactions.

"I do not trust the doctors I consulted who say I am alright because I think they are not knowledgeable. There are not many cosmetic surgery specialists in Hong Kong and most are not experienced enough (7) (make) the correct diagnosis and perform suitable removal surgery," Rao says.

The fear generated from her Google searches made her (8) (arrange) numerous visits to doctors, because she trusts search results more than doctors' diagnoses.

Dr. Greg Mak Kai-lok, an honorary consultant psychiatrist at Gleneagles Hospital Hong Kong, thinks that information overload makes it hard (9) (tell) right from wrong when patients conduct online self-diagnoses.

"If their health concern becomes overwhelming after doing online searches, they may feel more stressed, resulting in physical symptoms. This creates a vicious cycle of mental and physical health influencing each other," the private psychiatrist says.

Mak recommends (10) (get) a proper diagnosis from doctors instead of self-diagnosing. Even when they consult a doctor, they may not get diagnosed with any illnesses. One does not have to be ill to seek professional advice.

Clock in for adventure

The Invention of Hugo Cabret may be the most original and visually beautiful novel you will ever read. Using styles from traditional storytelling, graphic novels, and cinema, it chronicles the adventures of a 12-year-old as he tries to unlock a message from his late father (1) is hidden within the cogs and springs of a robot. Only with the help of a toyshop owner and his granddaughter can he hope to bring the robot to (2).

A time to be brave

During the early days of the depression in Paris, Hugo Cabret is orphaned and must go and live with his timekeeper uncle in a train station. His new home situation is far (3) ideal as Hugo must do all the work maintaining the clocks (4) his uncle lazes about and eats all the food. One day, Hugo's uncle disappears, and the boy must survive by stealing food, which brings the (5) attention of the policeman who patrols the station.

Machine code

(6) his daily struggles, Hugo manages to salvage a mechanical robot from a museum. This automaton is particularly special because it was built by his father and Hugo is convinced that within the machine is a secret message that his dad wanted him to decipher. Hugo plans to steal parts from a toy shop in the station to fix the automaton and (7) the message.

Trouble in store

At the toy shop, Hugo is (8) by the toy shop owner and his eccentric granddaughter. However, (9) handing him over to the police, they befriend him and with their help Hugo makes a breakthrough in his quest for answers, but also encounters new dangers.

With a narrative that incorporates intricate drawings, interactive diagrams and a real-life story, the book is a constant source of wonder. Some readers may criticise the relatively short length or some of the complexities of cinematography, but its originality, beautiful artwork and surprising plot twists should keep any curious reader (10).
